Whether you've been watching the whirlwind of news from the company and its chief Yves Guillemot in the run-up to their E3 2014 press conference, or you've been actually partaking in the pre-E3 festivities in LA, then you will know the full impact of the announcement, the talk and the time spent living in a happy bubble of good things, of announcements and possibilities. For many, the company announced Rainbow Six Siege and Watch Dogs 2. Meanwhile, other titles have slipped in their exclusivity with Rebellion, Turn 10 and the Criterion team behind Need For Speed. It was a jubilant, optimistic end to one of the most eventful spring days in Ubisoft history. In such a time, where the gaming press is a milieu of rumours and innuendo and Ubisoft have announced Watch Dogs 2, Rainbow Six Siege, The Division, an as yet unannounced Star Wars game, and some unannounced new IPs to coincide with their press conference in LA on the 30th June, you could easily be forgiven for thinking Ubisoft is in a pleasant little gaming bubble. Then you'd be wrong. For if the rest of the industry is enjoying good times, Ubisoft are still facing critical problems and industry stalwarts call for more news. In days of old, an E3 press conference was an exercise in which the great and the good of gaming were invited to sit and speak at c9d1549cdd

What's new in Escape From The Dragons:

vs. Wolff It was just before dawn. I glanced down at the soft grey floor of the cavern. I'd been up far too long and it was stressing me out. The blue sky above me seemed paler by contrast with the gloomy twilight below. I thought I could detect the distant smell of pine mingling with the damp air of the swamp. I'd stayed up most of the night watching the wild orb-like creatures that darted and whirred around me, mesmerizing me with their beautiful silver dance. That was not the only thing that had kept me awake; I was restless from the day before. The day before, I'd had to apologize yet again to the fake Omni Queen, Jak. And even though a cry of gratitude mixed with relief rang in my head, I still felt an obscure sense of guilt. Why was I being so cruel? I didn't have to apologize, any of it - my hand, my siding with the Wolff tribe in the first place. In time, I'd make peace with it somehow. But why, in the name of all that's rational, did I try so hard to prove how honest I was? Whether I could really believe that I valued Tamori more than I valued Omni still washed over me. I was almost sick of this conflicting feeling. I heard the door creak, apparently on command by everyone else in the room. "Good morning." I recognized Jak's peremptory voice. "Are you ready to go back home?" I nodded. Despite the fact that I wanted to ask him about the soft look that had lingered on his face in the middle of the night, or at least about those feelings that I couldn't define, I had to be mature enough to go on being professional for now. I should have apologized already, yet Jak was here with me, as if nothing had happened. He'd even accompanied me to the meeting yesterday, with a worried look in his eyes. I felt better just because he was here. "What are we doing now?" I asked. He ran his fingers through his hair before pulling it back over his ears. "Our team sets off soon to rescue your friend. We're going to see if we can find the door that lies between where we are and where Omni is." I couldn't hide my surprise. "Why you? Why not me?" He shrugged.
